

SpaceX-17, the 17th Commercial Resupply Services mission provided by SpaceX for NASA, is an unmanned cargo mission to the ISS (International Space Station). It is packed with more than 5,500 pounds of research equipment, crew supplies and hardware. The SpaceX Dragon spacecraft will launch on a Falcon 9 rocket from Space Launch Complex 40 at the Cape Canaveral Air Force Station. About 2-1/2 minutes after launch, the second stage is released pushing the Dragon capsule into a matching orbit with the ISS. At 9-1/2 minutes into the mission, the second stage releases the Dragon cargo craft to continue on to the ISS. As Dragon reaches its preliminary orbit, it will deploy its solar arrays and begin a carefully choreographed series of thruster firings to reach the International Space Station. It will take 2 days to arrive at Station. In addition to bringing research to station, the Dragon's unpressurized trunk is carrying the Orbiting Carbon Observatory 3 (OCO-3)

(-3) and the Space Test Program, Houston 6 (STP-H6). The OCO-3 will be attached to the Japanese Experiment Module. The STP-H6 platform holds a number of experiments developed at various schools and universities allowing students to learn the demanding art of creating hardware for use in space. The first stage is expected to return to an ocean landing just off the coast of Cape Canaveral about 9 minutes after liftoff.
