

Be aware that you don't need to be a space "professional" to play with space satellites. Ham radio operators have their own legal and authorized space satellites for decades, and anyone willing to put in some time and effort to get an Amateur Radio license can "Work the birds", and chat with other people over orbiting satellites, and even the International Space Station (many of the astronauts on board are hams themselves).

The Spacell Lunar Lander called "Bereshheet" in Hebrew, or "Sparrow" in English, has a propulsion system to enable itself to leave earth orbit and to enter a trajectory to the moon. After landing on the lunar surface, the lander will reignite its propulsion system to move a distance of at least 500 m to satisfy the rules of the GLXP.

Also in a "ride-along" capacity are payloads from some smaller US government and academic co-passengers, which will be separated from each other in geostationary transfer orbit.

PSN 9 is an Indonesian geostationary communications satellite, built by SSL (Space Systems Loral) in California for Pasifik Satelit Nusantara of Indonesia. It is intended to orbit the Earth in the Clark Belt (geostationary orbit) above the equator at 146° E longitude.

Spacell was an entry in the Google Lunar Lander XPRIZE (GLXP) competition. Google declared no winner for the prize, as the time had expired for completion of the prize goals, but the Spacell organizers decided to launch their entry to the Moon anyway.
